Not illustrated. 1911 Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER VII THE COST OF LABOB The labor account presents a very different set of conditions from those governing the methods used in connection with the purchase of materials. Materials are weighed, measured, or counted, and paid for at thirty or sixty days, definite sums for definite quantity and quality. Labor is far more difficult to appraise as to either amount or grade. Payment for labor is practically spot cash on delivery, the factory assuming all risks of rejection of bad work by future purchasers, and relieving the workmen of responsibility for their own faulty performances. The human element enters very largely into the labor item. Specifications for materials are expected and followed; but regulations to govern labor are received with hostility and disregarded to whatever extent will be tolerated by the management. The necessary rigidity and exactness of accounting methods must be applied with tact and caution, or labor troubles will diminish profits, and may even prevent the successful operation of the works. In the majority of factories, labor is paid for at stated intervals and in cash, by the primitive method of handing out the cash to each employee, without check or receipt. The transaction is purely personal between pay clerk and workers, and being dependent on personal care, disputes rarely arise. It is obvious that pay envelopes could be abstracted by the paymaster to his own advantage, except for the rigid rule that the pay roll is to be made up...
