For the past ten years the economic entomology of the corn plant has been made a leading subject of investigation in this State by the official entomologist, and in the course of these original studies a large mass of published matter has been scanned and summarized. The present report has been prepared in the hope (1) of finally bringing to bear on the practice of the corn farmer in Illinois all the entomological matter that ought to affect his procedure, and (2) of so massing and condensing the data from which practical and theoretical conclusions are to be drawn as to make it unnecessary for the investigating entomologist to cover the same ground again. To the first end I have prepared descriptions and classifications of insect injuries to corn which I venture to hope will be found intelligible and practically useful to the actual...
