Excerpt: . . . statements were in fact made by the deceased, we think the award should be confirmed. There is no merit in the contention of the railway company that it was not an employer and the deceased not an employee within the meaning of the Workmens Compensation Law at the time he received the fatal injuries. Section 3 of that statute defines employer and employee as follows: 3. Employer means a corporation employing workmen in hazardous employments . 4. Employee means a person who is engaged in a hazardous employment in the service of an While the relation of employer and employee as defined by the statute must have existed at the time deceased sustained the injury, it matters not whether the ployment was under a contract concededly valid as to both parties, or under a contract voidable at the election of the employer, or whether...
